December 7, 2019Contents The shark comes equipped with four fins and pouches where it can store up to 14 gallons of water (5.5 l) for diving and fighting; each fin is stitched together by 5 to 10 strands of bladder. The fins can be folded back against the fish's body, making it appear that the shark is only swimming with its head above the surface. The shark has two small, dorsally-placed, cone-shaped eyes that can be closed when the shark dives.
The eyes are by far the most sensitive part of the shark's body, and, by squinting, can detect the weak reflections of objects up to 110 meters (360 ft) away. Like other sharks, the chimaera holds its breath while waiting for prey to surface near the bottom of the ocean, and then it pounces upon its prey, in a form of 'all-out' hunting. However, the shark's primary feeding method is ambush. The chimaera is a fast hunter, having the best eyesight and sense of smell of any shark, and it uses both to track its prey to its chosen feeding ground. The shark can swim at speeds of over 20 knots and has been known to jump out of the water and fly in the air for several seconds. The shark's flexibility makes it possible to turn and twist itself as needed, permitting it to land on its back, flip over, or even swim upside down. The shark can also work well in murky waters as its eyes are better at detecting prey in dim light.
Although the shark can be spotted in temperate waters, the species prefers to live and migrate along tropical coasts, where the water is warm and the sun is strong, allowing the shark to dissipate body heat more efficiently. The shark is also capable of hunting large prey such as tuna and is one of the few sharks that is capable of hunting and swallowing whale sharks. They have also been known to attack seagulls, which sometimes fall into their mouths and are then swallowed.[3] The shark's diet varies according to its size and the region in which it lives; the average weight of mature chimaeras found in the North Atlantic is from. These sharks eat molluscs and crustaceans, fish, cephalopods, and occasionally large ray and squid; they can take up to six years to reach full adult size, and live for 15–20 years.[2] The chimaera trying to make an in-line table that looks like: 1 | 0 | 3 | 0 | 0 | If I put this into the body of the HTML, it has no width, while if I put it outside of the body, the width works. I have tried table-layout: fixed and table-layout: fixed with no success. I have also tried various ways of nesting tables, and wrapping the table in divs. I also have this attribute set on the table: style="display: inline-table;" Which is supposed to make all the elements: table-header-group table-footer-group table-row-group and table-column-group display as an inline table.
