Thanks!Characterization of the polymerase chain reaction method using DNA from frozen brain tissue samples. Genetic polymorphisms have been used to predict toxicity and drug response in patients taking prescribed medications. A variety of polymorphisms are known to occur in the cytochrome P450 (CYP) and glutathione S-transferase (GST) genes in the human population and their detection can serve as an effective biomarker for identifying individuals at risk for toxicity or at the extremes of a biologic response. In order to conduct broad population screening, we developed a polymerase chain reaction (PCR)-based method to detect polymorphisms in the CYP2E1 (CYP2E1*5B, CYP2E1*7), CYP1A2 (CYP1A2*1F), CYP2A6 (CYP2A6*1B), GSTM1 (GSTM1*0) and GSTT1 (GSTT1*0) genes. Although these polymorphisms have been described in the literature, we hypothesized that these markers may not be readily detectable if the tissue used for the DNA is derived from paraffin blocks rather than frozen tissue. In an attempt to detect CYP2E1*5B, CYP2E1*7 and CYP1A2*1F in paraffin-embedded brain samples, we identified low sensitivity as a result of DNA degradation. Thus, we investigated alternative methods of DNA extraction and amplification to detect these polymorphisms. We found that the sensitivity of the PCR could be increased by altering the conditions of DNA extraction and amplification. We were able to obtain sensitivity that would detect CYP2E
