ToA. A: I had made all the required changes and got a clean jar. And after taking a deep dive into the problem using eclipse's debugger, I found the solution. The point was that in my original multi project build path, one of the maven projects listed it's dependencies inside the jar and the 2nd project not. The 2nd project was trying to get dependencies from the 1st project when the jar was made instead of fetching the dependencies from the internet. The solution was to specify 2 different jars, one with the project dependencies inside and the second one without. A detailed explanation was available in this link. This link has the example of a multi project build with sub-projects. So, just paste this example into your pom.xml and change the name to your project.

Hope it helps It was an experimental film, a trailer for a season of television without episodes. But before viewers even saw an episode of Lost, the show's cast and crew had to go to extraordinary lengths to prove to ABC and NBC that they could actually pull off a first-season TV show. "We never really had that conversation," says Damon Lindelof, the showrunner and one of its creators. "We were just letting people know that this was not a joke, and that this was going to work." "We never really had that conversation." Not only did the three behind Lost create a whole new technology of selfcontained, spontaneous, and quickly produced halfhour TV, they did it in a fully self-contained way: They built the whole thing for them, but not on their own. "We built it in this state where we knew we had the offices to work in, we had cameras, we had equipment, we had lights, we had internet," Lindelof explains. "We built the whole thing and then we just shot it." After developing a proven track record on features—cowriting and co-directing the cult comedy series Alias and directing the recent blockbuster sequels The League of Extraordinary Gentlemen and A Beautiful Mind—the Lost team decided to move a TV show into production under an equally impromptu, barely tested, and entirely unpredictable plan. The four-and-a-half hour series followed two c6a93da74d
