Attempting to use Lightroom 4.3 to import these two images, I quickly completed the process, saved the resulting work, and then previewed it. It was clear something was wrong. Lightroom complained that not all the images were from the same type of camera. It also advised me "there were no values in the image."? This was an opaque reference to the fact the image was balanced between black and white. Still, I wanted to proceed, so I selected the "Non-Automated" method. This resulted in an "I don't understand" pop-up window, followed by Lightroom offering, "If you know what the information should be, you can change it." Great. (Curiously, Lightroom 4 offered the same dialog at this point.) An aspiring Lightroom photog may have had a similar experience or hoped to make use of substantially more dynamic range in Lightroom 5. Even though the iPhone image is in RAW, I no longer expect to find a selection of numbers indicating the camera's settings. Instead, Lightroom 5 only has a response of "No Selection." This is done to allow photographers to use editing methods that are not dependent on such information. Adobe held the banner of still image editing on iOS devices from the release of iPhone 5 in 2012 until the introduction of the Apple (S) Aperture HD (now Aperture) application in mid-2013. Lightroom 5 was the app to have on your iOS device, especially if you were a Lightroom 4 user. That is, until Apple launched its own imager and editing application, called Lightroom . However, despite Adobe's pivotal work in offering nuanced selection tools to mobile users, in January 2015, Apple removed Lightroom from the Apple App Gallery, leaving the door open for competition.

The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web. In the beginning, Photoshop was a monolithic product. But as the Web got bigger and better, we wanted to make sure we could deliver the same Photoshop experience to everyone. So in the 1990s, we created a distributed version of Photoshop for Mac (Macromedia Freehand) and Windows (Photoshop Lite). Photoshop Lite was an excellent way to bring the Photoshop brand to the Web. And it was easy to get going by using the File «From Adobe Lightroom on the web… tool. You simply upload a CMYK collection of images and they appear in an interface optimized for mobile. In the early 2000s, we realized that the Web could provide the scale we needed to build a future customer and development experience. Together with the Web Standards Project, we started the work on what has become known as HyperHTML, allowing us to make Photoshop available inside a page. Back then, we experimented with prototypes built from a range of technologies, including a version of Photoshop running inside Microsoft Silverlight. But we wanted to put our efforts into something really special, and Adobe Flash seemed to be the place to do it. In 2002, our engineers started work on what would become Photoshop in the Web. It was based on the existing Photoshop Freehand files. But instead of running as a plugin, we used an Adobe Flex file, and made it run natively in the browser. This was the platform we felt could bring the full creative power of Photoshop to people everywhere through the Web. 933d7f57e6
